This unit has been designed to introduce sixth through eighth grade students to immunology and microbiology in an engaging fashion. The problem-based learning format was chosen in order to allow students to acquire significant science content knowledge in the course of solving an interdisciplinary, "real-world" problem. This format requires students to analyze the problem situation, to determine what information in a variety of ways. In addition to library work and other information-gathering methods, student, with teacher facilitation, will perform experiments of their own design in order to find information necessary to come up with and evaluate solutions to the problem. The problem-based method also allows students to model the scientific process, from the problem-finding and information-gathering steps to the evaluation of experiential data and the recasting or solution of the problem. Finally, the overarching scientific concept of systems provides students with a framework for the analysis of both their experiments and the problem as a whole. Student will be able to analyze several systems during the course of the unit. These include the human body and its subsystem, the immune system, as well as the social and medical systems associated with the problem posted by the unit.
